who knew how write properly. It is a pity the custom has been ended because it is unlikely that future generations will be able to see and gain insights from the past as we can through these essays. 1 of 1 people found the following review helpful. A very real insight into ambassadorial perceptions! By Chris Thatcher If you like your history to be real and full of personal accounts from the ambassadorial "shop floor" then this book is a must-read. Witty, insightful and sometimes quite surprising. You will not be disappointed! 1 of 1 people found the following review helpful. A truly impressive collection By PalatS This collection of valedictory dispatches by British Ambassadors shows their wit and quality of mind. They have stood up to hindsight remarkably well. Pity that the institution decided to put a stop to the practice-- a sign of declining self confidence?

Matthew Parris's Parting Shots is a treasure trove of wit, venom and serious analysis. Up till 2006 a British Ambassador leaving his post was encouraged to write what was known as a valedictory despatch, to be circulated to a small number of influential people in government. This was the parting shot, an opportunity to offer a personal and frank view of the host country, the manners and morals of its people, their institutions, the state of their cooking and their drains. But it was also a chance to let rip at the Foreign Office itself and to look back on a career spent in the service of a sometimes ungrateful nation. Combining gems from the archives with more recent despatches obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, Parting Shots sheds light on Britain's place in the world, revealing the curious cocktail of privilege and privation that makes up the life of an ambassador. 'Wonderful ... a glimpse of that lost world of private eloquence and erudite candour' Matthew d'Ancona, Evening Standard 'Unbuttoned, indiscreet and very funny' Yorkshire Post Matthew Parris had a short career in the Foreign Office where one of his tasks was to distribute incoming valedictory despatches. He was a Conservative MP from 1979 to 1986, since when he has worked as a journalist. He is the author of A Castle in Spain, Parting Shots, and A Spanish Ambassador's Suitcase. He divides his time between Derbyshire (where his old constituency was situated) and east London.
