More snarky, misanthropic humor in Linda Ferro's assertive Chicago-Sicilian voice. It's rare to find well-written commentary from a middle-aged, middle-class wife and mom with a sharp take on the 21st-century American workplace and the consumer retail experience. A guilty-pleasure read that would truly go well with a vodka on the rocks.

The best revenge is when they never see it coming. Even better, they never see it at all. Sort of like letting the office jerk walk around all day with his pants unzipped. Because revenge isn't about personal satisfaction. It's a settling of accounts. And this book settles more than a few. "Ferro conducts a hilarious discussion of what it's like to survive in America on menial wages." – JT Haines, Co-convenor of The New Chicago Coalition, for Director of Urban Affairs for the National Urban League, and all-around nice guy, Illinois "Smart, funny, informative, and wise." – Susan B., (obviously) a person of refined literary tastes, New Jersey "A confidential head-trip into Ferro's world, where any problem can be solved with a flask, a credit card, and a whip-smart sense of humor." – Joyce Hanson, author, A Couple of Savages, New York. Pour yourself a cocktail (or two, and make sure you lie to your doctor about this), and get ready to discover that you were right – about everything – all along. But you knew that.

About the Author Linda Ferro is the author of "Underemployed Is the New Organic." She lives near Chicago with her husband, two cats, and a rather impressive collection of St. Anthony medals.
