Justin Derwent : Practice Makes Perfect before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Practice Makes Perfect:

It's the early 1970s and Justin Derwent is a newly qualified dentist who joins a country practice in a small town in rural Dorset. His memoirs are amusing and detail many of the varied characters he meets both professionally and socially during the early days of his career. The practice owner, Spencer Padginton, is particularly colourful; much-loved by his patients, and with a passion for food and vintage cars but very reluctant to replace the aged dental equipment with anything modern. Soon, women feature in Justin's private life. Unfortunately they bring their own problems especially when there is more than one on the scene at the same time. Everything one would expect from such a book is here - from difficult extractions and coping with a phobic nurse to dealing with patients reluctant to pay for their treatment. It might even convince you that your dentist is actually human.

About the Author Justin Derwent grew up in Yorkshire and qualified in dentistry at Leeds University. Later he studied for a master's degree in medical law at Cardiff University. He now lives with his wife and their ever increasing family of animals in an old farmhouse on the Dorset/Somerset border.
