Montague Marsden Glass : Worrying Won't Win before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Worrying Won't Win:

The inimitable Abe and Mawruss view the war from their practical, humorous standpoint, to the delight of all readers. American politics and European statesmanship in the idiom of the garment trade are as funny as a sedate business man in a masquerade garment. "And the only kick they've got, Mawruss," Abe said, "is that President Wilson won't expose his hand, which, if he did, he might just so well throw the game to Germany and be done with it." Montague Glass was an English born playwright, dramatist, and short story writer. This version of Worrying Won't Win includes original illustrations.
